Julia, the daughter of Blessing, testified that McGoldrick had ruined her, and when she asked him to redeem his promise of marriage, he said, "Go poison yourself." The father was then asked if he denied stabbing the complainant, and replied, "Deny stabbing him! No, sir; I did it, and intended to kill kim." Here the man was seized with hysterics, and shouted, "Oh, God! kill me here, judge, where I stand. What have I to live for? My peace is gone. The coward has ruined my daughter, and I am both were removed from the court-room. Here the girl clasped her hands, and said, "Oh, judge, that is not true. Oh! father, help me," and clasping her arms about the neck of her weeping parent she fainted, and was carried out of court. The judge then said: "I have examined this case at length for the purpose of learning if the father had been justified in avenging the wrong alleged to have been committed by the complainant." He had heard the evidence, and while his sympathy was with the prisoner at the bar, the law compelled him to place Mr. Blessing under $500 bail to answer. The bail was immediately given.
